RESEARCH INTERESTS

- Child-centered play therapy
- Counselor skill and personal development, contributing factors in development, and measurement of counselor confidence for therapeutic relationships
- At-risk children, youth and families
- High-poverty schools
- Person-centered and other humanistic approaches to counseling

BRIEF STATEMENTS ABOUT RESEARCH INTERESTS

In Jeff's way of thinking and research, it's all about relationships. Whether with highly troubled adolescents or at-risk children, Jeff often sees the therapeutic relationship, along with improving family and other naturally occurring relationships as the key to progress.

His primary current research projects involve multi-site data collection within standardized procedures in which child-centered play therapy (CCPT) is provided for children at high risk of juvenile delinquency.

Jeff is also the principal investigator of the Relationship Enhancement and Child Harmony (REACH) Project. REACH features CCPT as the critically needed, added intervention in high-poverty schools for high-need children. Jeff & Nancy Cochran are currently submitting studies of data from the past several years of service and beginning new grants and partnerships.

Jeff is also researcher counselor skill and personal development, including contributing factors in development, the progress of students confidence, and a new measure of counseling student confidence for therapeutic relationships.
